A fitting tribute at 9/11 memorial

People made ill by toxins deserve honor

Worn, but not beaten. That's the fitting description the National September 11 Memorial & Museum provided for the large stones that will point toward the sky and mark a new pathway at the World Trade Center: a tribute to survivors and first responders who are sick or have died from 9/11-related illnesses. The new section of the memorial will be located in a grassy section of the southwest end of the plaza.

It's been 16 years since first responders ended rescue and recovery efforts at the World Trade Center. But in illness after illness, and loss after loss, the tragic impact of the months they spent at "the pile" reverberates in the ongoing suffering of tens of thousands of rescue and recovery workers, area residents and others who were exposed to toxins.

Nearly 70,000 first responders and more than 14,000 survivors receive monitoring, treatment and care through the World Trade Center Health Program.

The national memorial's plan to acknowledge their plight, through a space called the Memorial Glade, is especially meaningful given the years those victims spent fighting for care and treatment. After all, it was 2006 when NYPD Officer James Zadroga died of a respiratory illness attributed to his work on the pile, and the Zadroga Act was proposed. But it wasn't until 2010 that the act was passed. It became permanent in 2015.

The image of first responders, some of whom were already ill, in the halls of Congress, begging our nation's leaders to help take care of them, still resonates. So do the stories of first responders still getting sick, still dying. As recently as May 26, David Levalley, a special agent in the FBI's Atlanta office, died of complications from exposure to toxins from the trade center. A week earlier, retired NYPD Officer Scott Blackshaw of Huntington Station died of cancer; he had spent six weeks in the rubble. And South Huntington resident Mark Natale, also a retired NYPD officer, died of cancer on May 4. He had helped people escape on 9/11, and then stood guard near Ground Zero.

The new memorial at the World Trade Center plaza will pay tribute to Zadroga, Levalley, Blackshaw, Natale and thousands of others, to their strength, heroism and sacrifice, and to the debt we all owe them.

Worn, but not beaten.

Illegal immigration's impact on the Island

The May 24 editorial, "Immigration's real challenges," is disingenuous. The problem is not immigration, it is illegal immigration. The problem is people who knowingly break the law to enter and stay in this country illegally. The problem is not that we need "comprehensive immigration reform"; the problem is that our immigration laws have not been enforced for decades.

You write, "People brought here illegally as young children, the Dreamers, can stay." If that is done, what happens to the next people brought here illegally as children? Do they get to stay? Do their parents and relatives get to stay? When does it end?

You speak of the "schools that have been overwhelmed by the demand to educate children, who beyond speaking and reading no English, often have had little education at all." Why have these schools been overwhelmed? It is because immigration laws have been ignored.

Enforce the laws! It will relieve the burden of these communities. The rights of American taxpayers should come before the wants of people in this country illegally.

While "Immigration's real challenges" accurately described the needs of communities such as Central Islip and Brentwood to receive additional public education funds, stakeholders should be aware of another means of providing funds to improve living conditions.

There is a $10 million state-funded Downtown Revitalization Initiative, and the Town of Islip has applied for those funds to modernize Central Islip's Carleton Avenue corridor. That could help to provide better and more employment and enhance the area's culture and economy. We will do whatever we are capable of to support that application, and hope that many others will do the same.

"Immigration's real challenges" argues that President Donald Trump misses the point by discussing MS-13 at a roundtable meeting on Long Island. However, the editorial ultimately made the case for the basic tenets of his immigration policies.

Highly skilled educators are critical to providing students with a quality education and opening doors of opportunity for their futures.

The state has a fundamental responsibility to improve students' access to great educators, while supporting teachers to become even more effective.

That's why for us, it's so troubling that the New York State United Teachers — the state's largest teachers union — is pushing lawmakers in the final weeks of the state legislative session to make the teacher evaluation system irrelevant.

Though New York's teacher evaluation law is far from perfect, this particular "cure" may be worse than the disease.

NYSUT's proposal, which has passed the State Assembly, supports more testing for students and risks making teacher evaluations meaningless — a disservice to teachers and students alike. And with a moratorium in place stopping districts from using third-through-eighth grade English language assessment and math test results in teacher evaluations while the state Education Department launched a collaborative process to improve evaluations, their proposal appears to be a solution in search of a problem.

However, as written, the legislation is a big step in the wrong direction. The bill, which dramatically expands collective bargaining to permanently remove state assessments from evaluations, is likely to lead to more — and unnecessary — local testing.

Instead of state assessments, teacher evaluations might now be based on a menu of "alternative assessments." But state assessments are still required under federal law, so any new assessments will add to the tests students take.

In addition, the bill risks making teacher evaluation meaningless. Based on NYSUT's comments, it wants to see more teachers evaluated on tests in subjects they don't teach and for students they don't teach — even when there is a good as-essment already available. That simply makes no sense.

Finally, the bill eliminates any consistency across school districts. Since each of New York's roughly 700 school districts could have different tests or use them in different ways, the bill would eliminate safeguards that help ensure the students most in need of highly skilled teachers have equitable access to them.

Getting the teacher evaluation law right matters for two important reasons:

First, basing teacher evaluation on the right factors can have a major impact on student learning and on teachers' professional experiences. State law requires that evaluation be a "significant factor for employment decisions" like retention, tenure and termination, and for professional support like coaching and training. If the feedback is based on the wrong things, those crucial decisions will have less value.

Second, having a meaningful and consistent statewide system of teacher evaluation shines a light on whether historically understood students are being given access to strong educators.

According to the Education Department, low-income students in high-poverty schools are 11 times more likely to be taught by a teacher rated ineffective than non-low-income students in low-poverty schools. Likewise, students of color in high-poverty schools are 13 times more likely to be taught by a teacher rated ineffective than white students in low-poverty schools.

There are two ways to make this educational injustice disappear: by identifying, supporting, recruiting and retaining the best teachers to serve in the schools with the greatest needs — or by masking the problem.

Instead of destroying the teacher evaluation system — and forcing students to take more tests — let's get it right.

Elizabeth Alvarado and Robert Mickens, parents of Nisa Mickens, who was slain by MS-13 gang members in 2016, attend a roundtable discussion with President Donald Trump in Bethpage on May 23.

Just because MS-13 has not killed anybody on Long Island in a year doesn't mean the problem has gone away. Gang activity continues to afflict our communities and the rest of our nation. But the editorial board describes the real problem as "a wave of young people from Central America," otherwise known as unaccompanied minors, placing a burden on our communities and towns. But wouldn't the president's proposals, including securing our borders, ending the visa lottery and limiting "chain migration," help eliminate this problem?

The first step is to stop the cause: illegal immigration.

Spending more money to accommodate immigrants here illegally is not the answer; it will only encourage more unaccompanied minors to come to Long Island. We must control illegal immigration while using our nation's resources to help people who are here legally.

Albany should further restrict tanning beds

The New York State Senate has an opportunity to protect our state's teens from a future of skin cancer. I hope it seizes this opportunity. The Assembly has passed legislation to close a loophole that allows 17-year-olds to use dangerous indoor tanning devices ["Tanning salon bill would ban minors," News, May 31]. But the Senate hasn't acted.

The American Cancer Society says almost 5,000 New York residents will be diagnosed with skin cancer this year. I am inspired to write this as a survivor of throat cancer. Also, I would not want my 17-year-old daughter to have access to tanning beds. If we do not protect them, our teens will be added to those numbers in the future.

Most kids don't realize the dangers of indoor tanning. Tanning before the age of 35 increases the risk of melanoma by 59 percent. Major organizations including the American Cancer Society Cancer Action Network are calling on the State Senate to pass this bill.

I, too, ask Senate Majority Leader John Flanagan and his colleagues to pass this bill before session adjourns. If we can protect our kids from skin cancer, shouldn't we?

Dental treatment can be expensive, too

I understand the cost of educating a dentist is high, but your story didn't mention the fees dentists charge patients ["Dental work: Why fewer dentists are opening private practices," Business, May 27].

I had a broken tooth and had to have a root canal in preparation for a tooth replacement. One root canal in 45 minutes cost me $1,450.

Unreal.
